Opening Plenary - Engaging and motivating our “Multiple Stimuli Generation”

While most adults are accustomed to text as the main means of receiving and processing information, young people nowadays are far more likely to use other sources. They are, in fact, the Multiple Stimuli Generation and we, as educators, should be taking that into account in our teaching and choice of materials. What's more, teenagers in particular are at a stage of cognitive development where, if we're not careful, we can alienate rather than motivate. In this participative plenary, we will look at some of the things going on in the brain that can be overlooked by busy teachers, and we'll try out some activities that will not only support your students and make the classroom a positive place to be but will also generate a lot of language.

Session - Teaching Teens and Breaking through the Barrier

Teaching teens can be stressful; that's something we all know. But being a teen is stressful, too, and learning or speaking a 'funny' language can be the most stressful thing of all. If you push a teen too far out of their comfort zone, the learning stops, the resistance starts, so how to break through the barrier? In this highly interactive workshop, we'll try out some activities that avoid triggering resistance and maximise learning and engagement. We'll look at support and prompts that motivate and generate, and we'll work our way into the teenage brain and help the learning stay there.

Session - Leave me alone! I said I don't want to learn!

Frustrated, challenging, disrespectful and sometimes aggressive. Sounds familiar? You're not alone. Teachers all over face the same problem: students unwilling to learn. Are they really that bad? Is there anything we can do? In this session we'll be looking at some strategies and activities that might help you turn little monsters into learners.

Session - The art of managing Teens

In this session we will look at the moment-to moment decisions we make on a daily basis on how to manage classes. We will then focus on how we can tweak our teaching skills and help reduce the stress of low-level behavior issues such as constant chatting.

Session - “We Got the Beat” – songs & chants in the EFL classroom

Do you know those catchy tunes that get stuck in your head and make you tap to the beat? What if we could do the same with language? In this session, through songs and jazz chants, we'll be looking at musically sticky ways of making language learning more memorable, engaging and motivating for our learners. So come along to a very practical session and be prepared to rap, sing, tap to the beat...and even create your own tunes to use in class!

Session - CLIL from Different Angles

From the practical to the theoretical: what are the different ways CLIL has been developed and which one might be right for you? This is an overview of different initiatives, with practical examples of good practice and time to discuss key points. Our objective is to see if there is something in CLIL for our contexts.

What's the story? Commercials in any language for teaching English?

Tap into commercials found on the web to mine for stories waiting to be told! A commercial is meant to tell a whole narrative in just a few seconds. So who not lend an ear (or an eye) even to commercials in other languages to kick start students' language production.
